

Westwild Creator Story License

Player-use permission letter for stories, journals, serial fiction, and web-novel style publication.

Permission granted. The Westwild creators encourage players to write and publish their own stories inspired by their runs, characters, and in-world adventures. You may post, serialize, give away, or sell those stories.

Your player-facing character, your original prose, and your scene-level storytelling remain yours. Westwild does not claim ownership of your personal character just because you played in this setting.

In return, please keep your work inside published Westwild lore, do not present your story as official canon, and do not market it as an official Westwild release unless you have separate written approval.

Plain-English summary

You may	You may not
Write journals, novellas, web novels, serial fiction, campaign recaps, and side stories set around your character trail.	Claim your story is official Westwild canon or an official release.
Publish for free or for sale.	Deliberately break or overwrite published lore while still calling it official.
Keep ownership of your original prose and your player-facing character expression.	Use this letter as permission to impersonate the creators or to issue licenses on their behalf.

Good-faith lore rule

If you are using Westwild names, places, peoples, and setting material, stay aligned with the published lore that exists when you publish. You may invent your own scenes, dialogue, side characters, and personal plotlines, but do not present contradictions as official truth.

Enforcement note

For work that follows the rules above, the creators do not intend to chase players for punitive damages merely for writing and posting their own Westwild story content. This letter is meant to make player storytelling feel safe, normal, and welcome.

This permission letter is a practical creator-use notice drafted for the Westwild tool suite. It is not legal advice, and it is not a substitute for a separately negotiated publishing contract if one is ever offered.

Issued with the Westwild tools package.
